SELF-PUBLISHING/CO-OPERATIVE PUBLISHING VS PROFESSIONAL PUBLISHING

A book is considered self-published or co-operatively published if it is published under ANY of the following circumstances:

- The author has paid for all or part of the cost of publication and/or distribution of the work.
- The author is required by the publisher to pay for editorial work and/or production of the book.
- The author is required by the publisher to pay for marketing.
- The book is published by a privately held publishing company with which the author has a familial or personal relationship.
- The book is published by a company or imprint that does not publish other authors.
- The book is published by a publishing company in which the author has a financial interest.

In contrast, in order for a book to be considered professionally published it must meet ALL of the following criteria:

- The publisher offers a screening process where a book selected for publication is followed up by a contract with an author and a professional editorial and production process.
- The editorial and production process is independent of the author and is taken on by the publisher at its own cost.
- The publisher prints the full press run, stores the books, pays royalties and, through a variety of methods, promotes, sells and distributes the books across Canada and internationally.
- The publisher has a proven track record of publishing books in adherence to these professional standards and more.

Please note: If your self-published book is later published by a professional publisher, your book may be eligible for submission.

We review our policies every year. Please check our website for updates and further information.
